"Jacob's Final Blessings" (Genesis 47:27-49:33) The Book of Genesis, pt. 50

Sunday, January 19th, 2025

Sermon Summary

- By Genesis chapter 47, Joseph's father Jacob, had been living in Egypt for seventeen years, reaching the age of 147. As Jacob neared death, he insisted that Joseph bury him not in Egypt, but with his ancestors (Gen. 47:27-31).
- Prior to his passing Jacob adopted Joseph's two sons as his own, in order to award them with part of his inheritance. Yet he intended for the younger son of the two, to have a greater inheritance than that of his older brother (48:1-20).
- Gathering all of his sons to himself, Jacob blessed some, but withheld his blessings from others; his sons becoming the twelve separate tribes of the nation of Israel (49:1-28).
- The eventual nation of Israel's future would have to be rooted upon a trusting faith and devoted reliance upon both the will and work of God, not any human action.
- God's sovereign and perfect wisdom repeatedly supersedes any of our own well-meaning aspirations and expectations, no matter how well-intentioned.
- All throughout history, God repeatedly chose the unlikeliest of people to do His work on the earth, most commonly so we would know God is behind it all; Jesus Himself, not resembling the Saviour people expected.
- Instead of just trusting that God holds the power to do a certain thing; we also need to develop a trusting confidence that God knows without question, what is best.
- We need to accept and understand that the Lord's plan might not necessarily match up to conventional wisdom.
- If we remain faithful to God, we can experience and receive His own faithfulness to us.

As God remains ever faithful to His promises, we must trust that He knows best, what will ultimately fulfill His plans.
